Island Portrait

In his new body of work, Island Portrait, Philip Frey renews his enthusiasm for invigorating brushwork and for bright, bold color. Unlike many of his peers, Frey embraces change, challenging himself to grow. In recent years, he has transitioned from acrylics to oils, and from realism to abstraction. While each foray has produced good results, fans of Frey's earlier work will be pleased to see a return to his expressionistic style and to more painterly brushwork.

Frey's new approach to light and color has the sensibilities of two notable East Coast artists who summered on Maine islands—Fairfield Porter of Great Spruce Head Island, and Dorothy Eisner of Great Cranberry Isle. Inspired by Porter, who stressed light and the physical properties of the paint, Frey worked en plein air on top of Cadillac Mountain to capture the grandeur of Frenchman's Bay in his painting From the Top to the Archipelago. Frey's block-like strokes of luminous color dominate the surface, a technique uniquely "Frey" that unifies his work throughout this series.

While many of Eisner's island paintings evoke a carefree life of summer parties, croquet games, and lounging in lawn chairs, Frey portrays his longtime interest in working waterfronts and the natural landscape. Waiting for a Crew shares an affinity with Eisner's graphic style and her preference for bold greens and purples, particularly in her croquet paintings. Frey's composition of tethered dinghies deliberately points attention toward the edge of an exquisitely painted dock. On occasion, Frey has used a heavy hand with contrast, sometimes sacrificing gestalt. But, in Waiting, he nails this balance between tension and harmony perfectly.

On a smaller scale, Last Shack Standing captures the solitude of ice fishing on a late winter morning. Frey's subtle shift between the muted tones of the shoreline and the cool accents of the melting ice bring a satisfying balance between the two planes. In Opposites Attract and Rusty, he demonstrates his competence as a draftsman and his capacity to make a composition compelling. He skillfully uses tight framing, foreshortening, and the juxtaposition of several objects. His color transitions have a new sophistication, and he uses a beautiful range of brilliant blues, and gritty browns, greens, and yellows to reveal the erosion of tarnished metal. The Pool, Low Tide, uses a similar pallet as if the rock formations along the shore are subjected to the same harshness the sea air inflicts the abandoned pickup truck.

Island Portrait stems from Frey's experience as a resident at The Heliker-LaHotan Foundation on Great Cranberry Isle. He was one of twenty-one artists awarded a 2012 residency. Frey and a group of six artists came together for a three-week residency on the island where they worked uninterrupted in the studios once used by John Heliker and Robert LaHotan.

From this experience Frey reconnected with his painterly roots with gusto, making Island Portrait a delightful vision.
