EMILY MUIR

Emily Muir (1904-2003) was born in Chicago and moved to Brooklyn as a child. In the late 1920s, she took classes at the Art Students League in New York City. Here she met her future husband, Bill, who was working at the League as a sculpture class monitor. Emily studied portraiture at the League as well (Isamu Noguchi was in her class). Richard Lahey, whom she studied under at the League, was a major influence. He was influential, she noted, "because he pushed her to paint with feeling—to paint what she felt, not so much what she saw."

She married Bill in 1928. They traveled the world as successful commercial artists during the Depression before settling in Stonington, Maine, where they dedicated the rest of their lives to creating art. Emily painted and worked with ceramics and mosaics. She created the beautiful mosaic of fishermen that graces the lobby of the Farnsworth Museum in Rockland, Maine.

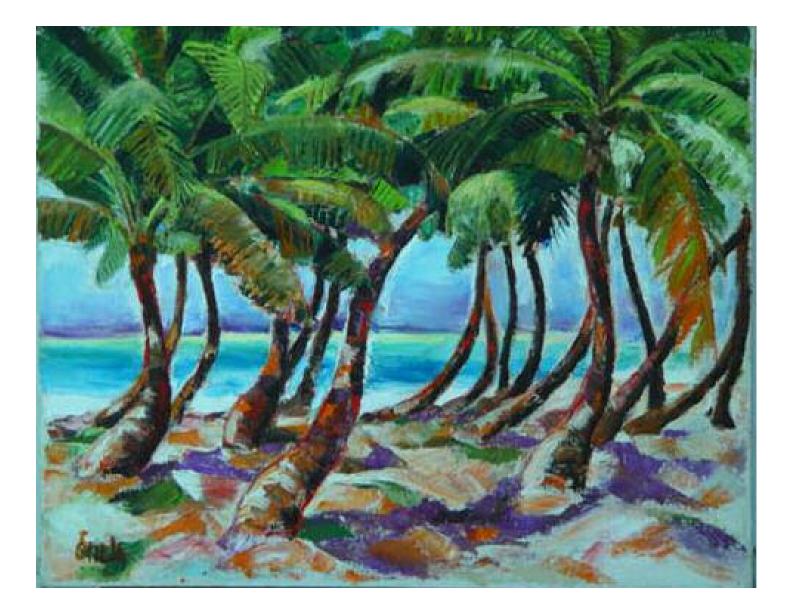

Having been an artist for most of her long life, Emily explored many styles and materials. She had her own take on cubism, for instance, where space, light and color make up faceted scenes of lobstermen and their boats and the seas upon which they toil. She also painted numerous portraits. Their various trips to different parts of the world are well represented in Emily's body of work. Villages around the West Indies, such as Trinidad, and parts of South America, as well as familiar scenes along the Maine coast are lovingly portrayed in her paintings.

Emily's legacy is her painting. Her work is included in the collections of the Brooklyn Museum of Fine Art, the Farnsworth Museum, the University of Maine, the Portland Museum of Art, and numerous private collections. Both Emily and Bill drew extensively and painted in watercolors. Their life-long lov-
